Valuing your business with trusted and experienced professionals

Needing a business valuation

Simply stated, a business valuation is an opinion of what a business is worth. In addition to using it for personal needs, business valuations are often required by lenders, insurance companies and governmental bodies.

Here are some reasons you may need a business valuation:

- Buy-sell agreements
- Marital dissolutions
- Estate planning
- Gifting and business succession
- Sale of a business
- Financing
- Family limited partnership
- Employee stock ownership plans
- Mergers and acquisitions
- Dissenting stockholder suits
- Compensating damage claims
- Insurance coverage

Creating value in a business

Even if you are not conducting any of these activities, you should still consider having a business valuation. Most business owners are unclear about what it takes to create value in a business. When you proactively conduct a business valuation, you understand the key components that add value to your business. This will help you be prepared for inevitable changes in your business such as selling it or passing it on to family members. Therefore, to understand what adds value to your business, you should meet with a credentialed business valuator long before the event occurs.

Choosing an experienced, independent valuator

Business owners who are seeking a fair, independent business valuation should be aware of the credentials of the valuator. Many valutors use formula methods, and typically, formula methods tend to undervalue a business.

At Honkamp Krueger & Co., P.C., our credentialed business valutors have performed hundreds of valuations in a variety of industries. We have seen it all! Our knowledge from this vast experience will result in a fair and accurate value being placed on your business.
